H. W. FISHER,
Business Manager of the GAZETTE.

Objector Holman has been left off the appropriations committee and has been given the chairmanship of the committee on public lands. In his new position "the watch dog of the treasury," as he is called, will have ample opportunity to distinguish himself, and the country will soon be informed of the immense amount of the public domain which has been stolen from the general government.

It is generally believed that a bill funding the Pacific railroad debt at fifty years will be introduced and passed by congress. Mr. Outhwaite of Ohio, the chairman of the house committee on Pacific railroads it is reported, has already drafted a bill with the above object in view. He holds intimate relations with ex-Senator Thurman of Ohio, whose knowledge of the affairs of the Pacific railroads is probably the most complete of any man whomever sat in congress. It is from him that Mr. Outhwaite has received valuable assistance in preparing his measure.

Mr. Randall's fellowship with his party while it may not be so cordial, is still sufficient to retain him at the head of the appropriations committee, the most important in importance in the house. The tariff reform element of the democratic party fully recognizes the value of Mr. Randall's support in any and of tariff reduction and every effort will be made to frame a measure which will meet his approval. In his position as chairman of the committee of ways and means he will be able to frame a bill that he can support, and instructions should be given to the democratic members of the committee to stand by the bill as framed by the chairman.

Senator Don Cameron of Pennsylvania, though representing the protection element of the country, has declared himself very frankly with regard to the idea that the surplus in the treasury should be used to reduce the tariff. He says: "We at this moment and of our financial system [illegible] with opinions expressed by [illegible] of our own leaders against the doctrines of the president's message. When a leading republican [illegible] advocates to continue its party to pronounce itself in favor of [illegible] the president's message, we have a practical illustration of the diversity of opinion on a question which now promises to be a leading [illegible]. But we can point to strong indications, we lost control of the Minnesota delegation in congress on this very question in 1878."

Mr. Mills of Texas, who has been the leader of the democratic side of the house by virtue of being chairman of the committee on ways and means, has served several terms in congress. He is a ready debater and his speeches are of the fiery character peculiar to representatives from the south. While a man of more than ordinary ability, he lacks the principal qualification of leadership, judgment. He is easily excited and will prove a ready victim to the sarcasm and ironical of Mr. Reed of Maine, the recognized republican leader. The democrats in congress miss the cool and deliberate judgment of Carlisle, for with Randall in the chair and Carlisle on the floor they were abundantly able to cope with the tactics of the republicans. In view of the important legislation which is to be considered during the present session the democrats are badly in need of a cautious and determined leader. Randall would do if he was in sympathy with the majority of his colleagues, but he is out of the question. The selection of any other man than Mills would have been to violate every precedent and Mr Carlisle had no alternative but to appoint him. In such men as Reed of Maine, Kelley of Pennsylvania, Long of Massachusetts and McKinley of Ohio, the republicans have towers of strength. Either of the above is fully qualified to cope successfully with the democratic leader. The opportunities for democratic blunders are quite favorable, and the republicans have competent leaders who will observe and improve them.

We publish this morning a complete list of the house committees as announced yesterday by Speaker Carlisle. Considerable speculation has been indulged in for several weeks past regarding the probable [illegible] of ways and means committee. It was virtually understood, however, a short time ago, that the chairmanship of this important committee would be given to Mr Mills of Texas, and that the democratic members of the committee would all be in sympathy with the policy of tariff reduction. The committee has been so formed. Mr Mills the chairman, is a radical free trader and is in favor of a measure even more sweeping in its effect than the Morrison horizontal bill which was defeated at the last session of congress. The other democratic members of the committee are all revenue reformers of the most pronounced type. It was thought by some that the speaker would give Mr Randall the privilege of naming one member of the committee, and it is that event that Mr Gay of Louisiana would be selected in order to defend any attacks on the sugar interests. But as it has turned out Mr Randall and his followers are without a representative on the committee. It is worthy of notice that Mr. W. L. Scott of Pennsylvania, who is placed on the committee, is one of Mr. Randall's personal opponents in his state, and led the opposition against him in the Allentown convention last summer. Mr Scott made a stubborn fight considering the strength of Mr. Randall's forces, and commanded the respect of those who defeated him. It is stated that he was averse to accepting a place on the committee, and that it was only through the personal appeals of President Cleveland and Speaker Carlisle that his aversion was overcome. Though the representative of a Pennsylvania district Mr Scott is strongly in favor of reform in tariff taxation and his speech on the Morrison bill was one of the most carefully prepared of any delivered on that measure. As we expect the republican members of the committee on ways and means will prove themselves valuable acquisitions among the most able representatives on the republican side. Of the thirteen members of the committee, seven are from the south, one from New England two from the middle states and four from Ohio, Michigan and Indiana. There is a Kansas member on the committee who represents a district west of the Mississippi river. The committee has been made up for a definite object, and that object is to report a bill for a reduction of the surplus money with [illegible] President Cleveland's message.

OUR MEXICAN LETTER.

From the Ruins Vile Makes a Trip Over a Rough Mountain Pass.

[Special Correspondence.]

STATE OF DURANGO, Mex., Dec 15.—Since writing my last, in which I mentioned some ruins, I have discovered from the old man who showed us that, that there are many other ruins hidden in various parts, but which are entirely unknown to the explorers as yet, for two reasons. This part of Mexico is less understood and has been less explored than any of the other districts on account of the extreme dislike of the natives to foreign excitement of any kind or even presence, and when the report of any such [illegible] is known the natives conceal it as much as possible. Besides, all this part of the country has for many years been so overrun with robbers that few people who had the temerity to try to go through them ever came away again.

The old man told us that [illegible] twelve years ago a man with quite a party and with strange accoutrements [illegible] through there looking at everything and report has it that he was hunting for coin, but as those who knew of this place and others thought he was hunting for [illegible] they made it their business to molest him as far as they could from [illegible] scriptions, I imagine it must have been the French explorer, Chalet, who spent so many profitable years in this country. The [illegible] was too small to [illegible] and it was doubtless this [illegible]. It is a pity he [illegible] that ruling, which would have [illegible] him into real [illegible] into the subject he was studying.

After we left the old man's hut, which we found the truest kind of hospitality, we started boldly along up the mountains, for the most part riding our horses and leading [illegible] as it was all the mule could do to drag the vehicle along. It was amusing to hear the cook, or Mexican in charge, at some unusual jerk or jolt put the [illegible] or water jars or some other part of his own part of the load to jingling. He could not utter a word while in motion so he would stand still with his hands outstretched and call down all the vengeance of the whole calendar of saints from the roof, the driver, the carriage and I think on us also.

At last we found a level spot where we could rest for dinner, and while the [illegible] was preparing it, and meaning over the fact that a small jar containing a [illegible] had got broken and the [illegible] had soaked into a box of crackers, the little woman and myself walked to one side and looked at the magnificent [illegible] spread out around us, above and below us. Mountains, precipices and delightful ravines in every direction, which looked all the more abrupt from the [illegible].

After dinner we pushed on as far as our [illegible] could go, and then—prayed for the light in a little valley scarcely large enough to turn [illegible] around in. After the inevitable putting up of those [illegible] we sat for a while out by the fire, for it was cold enough to make one not only [illegible], but necessary. The [illegible] said:

"I see something up there that looks like two points of fire."

At [illegible] showed me what it was—jaguar or panther, but I turned it off carelessly and persuaded her to wrap up warmly and sleep in the wagon, as the ground was too cold; and then I kept piling on wood little by little all that long night and watching with my rifle in hand and my pistols by my side for any move toward us of the brute. It moved about [illegible] and yet never came nearer, and when daylight came it disappeared altogether.

EDWARD VILO

Modern French Sculpture.

Harper's Magazine.

In France sculpture is strictly a national art not owing its origin like French painting to foreign inspiration, but a spontaneous manifestation of natural gifts wholly from the fourteenth to the seventeenth century, displayed incomparable sculptural genius. The [illegible] of that period, Luca della Robbia, Donatello, John of Bologna, Ghiberti, Michael Angelo, and Verocchio are ever to be among the greatest masters, but after them the plastic genius of Italy fell asleep, and since the Renaissance there has been no really great sculptor south of the Alps. As for Canova he can hardly be regarded seriously in a tenth rate modeller of cupidons who are chained to early nature, while the [illegible] Italians with the exception perhaps of Jean Dupre, are simply mannerists, hewers of marble, skilled even quite a miracle in carving the pattern of a lace collar or imitating the texture of a tweed shooting jacket. Germany in the 16th, 17th and sixteenth centuries boasted Peter Vischer, of Nuremberg, one of the masterpieces of Augsburg, and many carvers of polychrome, wooden [illegible] who were [illegible] but [illegible] successors. There is no country richer in museums than modern Germany, its country where [illegible] are endlessly [illegible] in higher [illegible] towns, where [illegible] are finding more marvellous, more profoundly and with a more complete color the crucial [illegible] and art we can [illegible] to [illegible] spect to modern Germany only for except Rauch. Spain has never had exclusively sculpture. England has [illegible] called to [illegible] to perpetuate the forms of royalty. Belgium can claim but one sculptor, Plevenaks a the Dane and he was a docile pupil of Canova. In France on the contrary we find that sculpture has flourished incessantly and uninterruptedly even since the middle ages when the [illegible] were [illegible] the gothic cathedrals were [illegible] and [illegible] was [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Miss Lillian Olcott and her company presented "Ingomar" at the opera house last night, giving a most excellent interpretation of Mrs. Lovell's popular play. Miss Olcott has been a favorite number of plays in Colorado Springs during the short time she has been on the stage, but never has she showed to better advantage. She has found in Parthenia a character that is well suited to her petite and artistic style. She had previously essayed Juliana, but is too well known to play Juliana to appear to advantage, and Miss Olcott gave to the character of Parthenia the sweet, naive charm of the simple Grecian maiden, especially during the talk between her and Myrtis. Her Parthenia will rank with the best, and when he appears in New York she will be found on legitimate character.
